ON THE LATINIZATION OF NAMES.

(Classical Journal, Vol. I. p. 247, seqq.)

THE learned Huet, Bishop of Avranches, who spent a long life chiefly in reading, has left a paper published in the "Huetiana," on the subject of putting men's names into Latin. The proper mode of effecting this was a matter of no small importance in the periods when scholars and men of science universally wrote in the Latin language, and when even narrations relative to modern history were frequently composed in that tongue; nor has it at present entirely lost its interest, since many writers upon topics of erudition on the continent, and some in our own country, continue the practice. A summary of the Bishop's Essay, therefore, with a few additional remarks, may not prove unacceptable. The author begins by observing, that examples may be met with of the manner of naturalising names derived from a foreign country, both in the Oriental, the Greek, and the Roman writers. The latter, however, are those, whose practice ought especially to have served as a model to modern Latinists; who would have found that the Romans universally either cited foreign names unchanged, as they heard them pronounced, or accommodated them to the genius of their own tongue, merely by giving them the Latin inflection and termination, without regarding their signification. Thus the Greek names Πλάτων, Πυρρὸς, and Ἐπικούρος, implying the senses of broad, ruddy, and auxiliary, are simply rendered by Plato, Pyrrhus, and Epicurus. In other cases they have changed the Greek termination ος into the Latin er; as Alexander, Periander, &c. though even here the oldest form seems to have been Alexanderus, Perianderus, &c. These authorities, however, were not regarded by the moderns, who, in their Latinization of names, followed no certain rule, but their own particular fancy. Their various methods may be thus arranged:

The most inartificial was that of giving the christian name in Latin, and the surname in its proper form; as Johannes Mandeville, Bartolomæus Glanville, Gulielmus Ockam, Johannes Duns, Johannes Gerson.

Others, who had no surname, a common case in early times, formed one from their father's christian name, examples of which they found in their own languages: thus in English we have Johnson, Thompson, Williamson, &c. This mode of Latinization gave such names, as Johannes Christophorus, Petrus Raymundi, Franciscus Martini, Gulielmus Duranti. Sometimes the name of another relation, or of a friend, gave the appellation; as Petrus Damiani, Eusebius Pamphili.

Surnames have often been taken from the name of the person's country, added in the form of a patronymic adjective. Thus we have Gulielmus Parisiensis, Gilbertus Anglicus, Josephus Iscanus, Gulielmus Brito, Otho Frisingensis. Frequently, however, it was thought sufficient to subjoin the name of the country with a preposition; as Gilbertus de Hollandia, Dominicus de Flandria, Henricus de Hesia, Petrus de Saxonia. This latter mode was more used when the place of nativity was of small consideration; as Gulielmus de Nangiac, Jacobus de Voragine, Thomas a Kempis. To these patronymic surnames may be added a number derived from a fief, a lordship, an estate, and a residence, of which examples appear in Petrus de Casa, Leoninus de Porta Sancti Petri, Gulielmus de Rubrugis, Petrus de Vineis, Alnus de Rupe.

The majority of surnames have been taken from corporeal qualities, dispositions, trades, professions, and other circumstances in common life. Of these there are abundant examples in all modern languages; as in English we have White, Brown, Smith, Mason, Bold, Merry, &c. It has been a common practice in Latinization to translate such names by equivalent terms; and thus have been produced the Latin names of Dionysius Exiguus, Olaus Magnus, Hugo Candidus, Dominicus Niger, Petrus Crinitus, Johannes Jesumator, Petrus Comestor, Rodolfus Agricola, Jacobus Faber, Jonchimus Camerarius, Marius Mercator, and a number more of the like kind. But this mode, though it might seem an elegance, was in fact the source of all that ambiguity concerning the identity of persons, which is the greatest fault of nomenclature. For the Latin word being the same from whatever language the translation of the real surname was made, persons and countries became necessarily confounded, and no trace was left by which the man, who was known to the learned world by his writings, could be discovered in his private life and family connexions. The evil was still greater, when modern historians, who wrote in Latin, adopted this mode of transforming names, thus filling their pages with riddles or enigmas, which it is impossible to solve without a knowledge of persons and things from some other source. The excellent de Thou has been singularly faulty in this respect, and has made a particular vocabulary necessary for the understanding of his history. Without such an explanation, who, for example, would discover the house of Entragues, in Interamnus, or Menage, in Oeconomus?

The pedantry, that naturally accompanied the revival of classical literature, promoted this method of travestying names; men of learning thinking those they bore in the vulgar tongues of their respective countries unfit to appear in the title-page of a work of erudition. Thus Erasmus both Latinised and Græcised his name of Gerard (signifying amiable in Dutch) to Desiderius Erasmus. Thus Reuchlin became Capnio; Schwaertsdit, Melanchthon; Des Jardins, Hortensius; Huusschein, Oecolampadius; De l'Hopital, Xenius; Geishauer, Myconius; Grosman, Megander; Voorbroeck, Perizonius; De l'Oeuvre, Operarius; Vander Beken, Torrentius. Casaubon, in his first works, called himself Hortibonus; but afterwards with better judgment, returned to his true name, with us subjoined. Chandieu, a minister of Geneva, even went to the Hebrew for a version of his name, and wrote himself Sadeck. It was a much greater offence against taste to form hybrid names, composed partly of the vernacular, partly of the translated appellative. "I have often been surprised," says Huet, "at receiving letters from James Pannier de Gretemesnil, from his residence at Vandeure, dated Vandopera, as if the word had been compounded of the barbarous term Vand, and the French oeuvre, rendered Opera, whereas the whole is a purely English word, corrupted from Wandover." Instances of this kind are Rocheposay, Latinised (by Scaliger) into Rupiposæus; Roche foucault into Rupifoualdius; Tourneroché into Tornorupæus. Some refined scholars, through their attachment to antiquity, were led to quarrel with their own baptismal names, and to change them for others resembling them in sound, borrowed from the pure times of Paganism. Thus Johannes was altered to Janus, by Parrhasius, Læcuria, Cornarius and Douza. A Dutch professor took Petrelus instead of petrus. It was made one of the charges against the learned and elegant Palæarius (burnt for heresy in 1579) that he had changed his christian name of Antonio for Aonius; which, however, he needed not to have done on a classical account, since Antony is a good Roman name; but it was rather in consequence of an affectation which then prevailed among those who dedicated themselves to polite literature, of assuming new names in a kind of classic ceremonial. Thus Jacopo Sannazaro adopted the names of Actius Sincerus, and Filippo Buonacorsi. of Callimachus Experiens. Gaucher de Saint Marthe translated his proper name into Scævola, erroneously (according to Huet) supposing that Gaucher had the signification of left-handed.

To the same passion for antiquity Huet ascribes the prevalent practice of Latinising names by the termination ius, in imitation of the greater part of the Roman families; as Grotius, Baudius, Heinsius, Vossius, Lipsius, Bigotius. This he acknowledges often sounds better, though the more simple and regular formation in us has succeeded very well in Muretus, Turnebus, Doletus, and others. He confesses that he himself is a defaulter in adopting the name of Huetius; but this was in his youth, and was first imposed by his learned correspondents. Here the Bishop of Avranches closes his remarks on this subject.

In England, the Latin writers have never, it is believed, adopted the pedantic affectations just mentioned, but have followed the simplest mode of Latinizing proper names. With respect to the two terminations us and ius, it would seem that when the staple of the name is preserved entire enough to render it easily cognisable the rest may be left to the decision of the ear. The common English termination in y and ey naturally forms ius; as Hay, Rivius; Harvey, Harveius; Bentley, Bentleius; that in e mute likewise has been similarly converted; as Musgrave, Musgravius; Pope, Popius; (Clarke's Homer,) Hare, Harius; yet More and Pole were made Morus and Polus by the writers of their times. Perhaps, however, the English monosyllabic names in general are advantageously lengthened by the dissyllable termination; as Lowthius and Toupius. Our more sonorous names do not seem to want this help; and Murkinus, Hudsonus, Wartonus, and Porsonus, may pass muster with the other "gens en us," as the French call them. As the modern taste is in general averse to pedantry, the custom prevails both in England and on the continent, for an author in his title-page to give his name in its vernacular form; as Lowin, Clayne, &c. but the Latin termination is assumed in the oblique cases when they speak of another person; as in dedications: thus, Heynio, Hermanuo; and the like. How far this violation of analogy is justified by the rules of grammar and good taste, is left to the classical critics to decide.

ABH

A ab, and abs, are prepositions of the same signification, and govern the ablative case. The first is used before words beginning with a consonant, the second before such as begin with a vowel, and the last when the initial consonant is q or t; for the exceptions with respect to r and s are so very few that they scarcely merit notice. Ab is of most frequent occurrence, from standing before not only all the vowels, but all the consonants occasionally, unless q, v, and z. According to most Dictionaries its significations exceed twenty; but although the English may be improved by that variety, it will be of advantage to the learner to restrict the number to three or four. Indeed this variety of meaning is not suggested or conveyed by the preposition, but arises chiefly from the other words of the sentences, as the following examples from Ainsworth will testify. 1 From. 2 By. 3 By reason of. 4 After, next. 5 At. 6 In. 7 The term from. 8 For that reason. 9 Out of. 10 From. 11 Against. 12 For. 13 After. 14 For, on our side. 15 On. 16 With. 17 In comparison of. 18 As far as from. 19 Towards an object. 20 The moving cause, for, out of. 21 The part affected. 22 A relation to the subject. In all these instances, the preposition may be translated by from, by, or for. Take the same author's examples. 1 A rebus, from things. 2 Ab his, by these. 3 A spe, from hope. 4 Ab illo, from him. 5 Ab ostio, by the door. 6 A mendacio, by a lie. 7 A labore, from labour. 8 A re, from the thing. 9 A Germaniâ, from Germany. 10 A puero, from a boy. 11 A frigore, from the cold. 12 A me, for me. 13 A securi, from the Exilium, i. n. [ab exul] exile, banishment. [Exilium, denotes simply a removal from one's native soil, not necessarily implying either of the two accessory ideas, compulsion or disgrace. The banishment implied by exilium, may be either voluntary or involuntary. It was compulsory, when it took place in consequence of the sentence, interdictio aqua et igni, for, being deprived of all the necessities of life in his native country, the individual had no alternative but to go into exile. A person banished by a legal sentence, or who chose to exile himself, to escape punishment, forfeited, but not irrecoverably, all the rights of citizenship. Deportatio differs from exilium in implying uniformly that the banishment is involuntary, that the rights of citizenship are irrecoverably forfeited, and that the property of the individual, unless secured to him by an express clause in the sentence, is confiscated. The place also of his exile was not left to his own choice; and was generally some rocky and barren island. Relegatio agrees with deportatio, and differs from exilium, in denoting, that the banishment is always involuntary. It did not however, exclude the individual from the rights of citizenship, and allowed him the entire possession of his property. He was permitted also to bequeath it by will. While deportatio implied a fixed residence, to which the exile was to be confined, relegatio rather referred to certain territories from which he was excluded.]

[Homo, in its primitive acceptation, denotes one of the human species, as opposed to a being of another species, to one of a superior, or one of an inferior order. Hence, as homo is applicable to any of the human species indiscriminately, it implies no peculiar merit or excellence, in the individual to whom it is applied; and is used indifferently for men of any class or character. Vir, on the other hand, means a man, in contradistinction to a woman or a boy. And hence, as it implies those qualities and properties which constitute the man, it is used as a term of respect, and often signifies emphatically a hero.]
